Precomposed vs. decomposed: Unicode offers two ways to write an accented letter. PRECOMPOSED gives one dedicated code point to a specific letter+diacritic pair (e.g. U+1E6D for ‘t with dot below’). DECOMPOSED instead writes the plain base letter followed by a separate combining mark (e.g. ‘t’ + U+0323 COMBINING DOT BELOW), which the font stacks onto whatever precedes it. Both render identically in a well-built font. Precomposed code points exist only for combinations common enough to have been given their own Unicode slot — which is why ‘t with dot below’ and ‘b with dot below’ have unrelated-looking numbers even though both are built from the same dot-below mark. Rarer combinations (e.g. ‘d with line below’ plus an extra dot below) have no dedicated slot and must fall back to the combining-mark route. A Character Name starting with ‘Combining’ below is one of these bare marks, not a full letter on its own.
